I left Luxembourg on the eight o'clock train, arriving in Paris in the early afternoon. The house is in great confusion, with packers all over the place.

The Dillons had a dinner of 30 or 40 people in our honor tonight, and it was most agreeable. Doug made a speech and I responded as best I could. They were so charming as to give E. and me each a present — for her, an ivory dolphin, and for me, two Brussels porcelain lions. Both presents were quite beautiful, and we were much touched by it.
